Apple released iOS 11.2.5 beta 2 (build 14E32c) earlier today for developers, a minor update that includes bug fixes and improvements across Apple's mobile operating system. Apple has seeded the update to registered developers already, with an official release date expected soon. Among the improvements and bug fixes, Apple has redesigned the Home screen to make the interface more personal and avoid cluttering the screen. The company has also tweaked the Tabs feature, now allowing apps to have multiple tabs within a single view. Other features added in iOS 11.2.5 include an alarm app during bedtime, support for unlocking via Face ID and improved Siri functionality. Apple has also improved security, but the release notes do not include any major issues. iOS 11.2.5 is available to registered developers already and should be live shortly. Those interested in getting in on the new features can either download the OTA update via iTunes or update manually through the Software Update function. [Update: OTA Update] Apple just released iOS 11.2.5 over-the-air to registered developers. The company says that the update "includes bug fixes and improvements," but it's not immediately clear what has changed. I understand Oracle has made some significant changes to the transactional software in CRS 12.2.0.0. The main change is the removal of Extended Maintenance Mode (aka "EM
